jpg A couple years ago, I went on a weekend-long backpacking trip up to Mt. Takehara in the mountains of Kakegawa, Shizuoka Prefecture. The day I was supposed to leave was completely under the dark cloud, so I opted to go for an early morning hike. The weather was quite dismal, with low temperatures and rain, and there was a trail leading up to a forest. So the whole road is basically covered with a thick frost, and in a few moments you feel you're walking on icy snow. I really felt like I was in a different world and my brain began to freeze at the same time. I thought, "It's like walking through a fairy tale." When I was young, I used to read a lot of fairy tales. My first memory is that of an old clock that my parents bought me. It belonged to my grandfather, who died when I was in elementary school. So there was a big circular clock hanging on the wall, and I was always by the clock. Every time I looked at the clock, it seemed to tell me, "If you want to be strong, then you have to go on." I wish I could tell my younger self that. What's the matter with me? Why am I telling myself such things? (laughs) I guess I'm just thinking about something that happened a long time ago. I started to wonder about this, and I noticed that every time I thought about it, I began to get a little sad. After a while, I realized that this is my first time thinking about such things. I've always been a cheerful person, but I didn't want to make myself cry. I couldn't understand why the thought would always make me sad. It's like this over and over. The more I think about it, the more I get sad. So, I decided to find out what kind of people get sad over such things, and maybe it would help me get through this. In the end, it would be the same as the old story of the boy who cried wolf. I'm not as good at searching as I thought. But, with a little effort, I got my answer. It was a happy one. So, I thought it might be good if I shared it with all of you. I went to a classified ad website called Yahoo! Japon (All Japan Yahoo) 82157476af
